

History

Sobrante Ridge is part of the ancestral homeland of the Saclan, one of six California Native American tribes whose primary language is called Bay Miwok today. Since time immemorial these tribes have maintained a strong connection to the land.

In 1841, under Mexican government colonialism, the land was granted to Juan Jose Castro and became part of the vast Rancho Sobrante. At that time, great herds of Spanish longhorn cattle freely roamed the hills and were valued by the rancheros for their hides and tallow.

Beginning in the early 1900s, the area was known as the Cutter Ranch, and belonged to Cutter Laboratories in Berkeley through the 1970s. The lab raised horses and cattle there, using blood from the animals to produce tetanus and diphtheria vaccines.

When developers in the 1980s wanted to build homes in the area, the East Bay Regional Park District and surrounding communities advocated for the preservation of the scenic ridgelines and the rare endemic plant life. The unique natural area was donated to the Park District in 1985 after the local construction company agreed to limit the subdivision to the low-lying areas.
